The 17-year or northern locusts oc-

Here is some interesting information regarding this strange insect which you doubtless have forgotten since its last appearance, 13 or 17 years ago. In the first place you must not speak of it as the locust, but as the "cicada." Its common miscalling is due to the fact that in earlier days was confused with the locust of the Orient, which differs very little from the American grasshopper. The tormer has a thick body with straight legs, while the latter is slender in body and has long hind legs, hinged far above the level of the back. In the old world locusts have been known to swarm in such dense clouds as to screen away the light of the sun from broad areas and to stop the flow ant relations with the judge. Although there are traditions to that effect, the cicada has never been known to perform

The most serious depredations performed by it are the hacking and gnawing of trees, which is purpose of depositing her eggs. The insects of both sexes graw the roots ground strgc. Twigs hacked by the can generally endure this depredations which to them seldom amounts to more than a general trimming, but vandals. The agricultural department has always advised growers not to set out young trees just before a ravage of cicada is espected in their neighborhoods. Muslin netting, or paper bags tied over their topt are about the only means of protecting the trees if already grown. The danger from the depositing of the eggs will be over in about three weeks after the first appearance of the insects, which will occur in the last week of May in Ohio, and in the Southern states a fortuight or three

> The cicada's strange characteristic of living under the ground during the greater portion of its life and of afterward coming to the surface, to grow wings and die after only a few weeks in the daylight, makes it the greatest freak of the insect world. The 17 and 13-year individuals differ only as to the lengths their under-

Upon noticing a brood of cicada you will notice that about half of them are two thirds as large as the remainder in individual size. This difference in size has caused the mistaken supp sition of many that the 'arger are ma les and the smaller the females. They always travel together, have habits in common, lay their eggs in the same trees and partake of the same food. There is another erroneous theory that the small ones are the youngsters of the brood, but as a matter of fact every creada which will appear in this year's broods will be of the same age, either 13 or 17 years old. These cast-offs are the "loenst shells" which generally interest chrildren during the locust seasons. The new rainment is at first glossy white, but gradually darkens. As if touched by a magic wand, each reincarnated insect is suddenly given wings, which equip it for its real

The cross-ribs upon the wings of cicada form the letter "W." The ignorant, who are unfamiliar with the periodical habits of the insect will probally tell you that this is an omen foretelling war. And the only correct rognostication which can be made is hat the two "Ws" forewarn "warm venther." In the Orient the wild loensts and honey were considered to be the food of the gods. In Arabia he Oriental locust is pounded into a powder for breadmaking. In many parts of the East may be found shops which deal exclusively in locusts for food. Prof. Riley, former entomologist of the department of agriculture, reported once that he had eaten the American locust, after detatching the wings and legs and frying the bodies in oil. He did not find them particular palatable.
